For The Church

James begins his New Testament letter with: “My brethren, count it all joy when you fall into various trials.” At first glance, the message is contradictory: how can we possibly experience joy during life’s trials? I hate trials. They make me sad, anxious, depressed, and lonely. Yet I think the common misunderstanding and dissatisfaction with biblical joy comes from secular culture’s one-dimensional definition of joy.

Modern secular culture teaches us that joy is an emotion one can achieve by following a protocol. Go on this vacation and you will achieve bliss. Wear this new brand and people will like you and then you will be happy. Do this workout and bask in the post-sweat high. In this way, good feelings are like vending machine snacks: if you press a few buttons, put in a couple coins, you are fed what you desire. Dopamine released; joy acquired.

This secular joy is a temporary after-effect of something you had to work for. Once you feel it, it’s easy, one-dimensional glee—untinged by anger or sadness. It is conditional on what you do or get, and is therefore unstable. And most importantly, this type of joy is contingent on doing or getting a certain thing.

On the other hand, joy in Christ completely contradicts this contemporary understanding— appearing sometimes as the opposite of what you’d associate with happiness and ease.

Biblical joy is not a temporary emotion, a release of the right chemicals. It is a way of being, a lifestyle, a lens through which you walk through the world. Noticing the word “count” in James 1:2, I realize that it is a choice we deliberately have to make; our perceptions are our reality. Biblical joy serves as a tool to face the darkness. Biblical joy is a choice. It is hope and faith.
